THE TRILATERAL COMMISSION
A Selected List of References
Compiled by
Ruth S. Freitag
Research Services

Founded in October 1973, the Trilateral Commission is an unofficial body with members from North America, Western Europe, and Japan who meet as private citizens, at intervals of six to nine months, to discuss major issues of common interest. According to the statement of purposes issued in October 1973 by the organization's executive committee, "The Commission will seek to promote among Japanese, West Europeans and North Americans the habit of working together on problems of mutual concern, to seek to obtain a shared understanding of these complex problems, and to devise and disseminate proposals of general benefit." Members are in the main persons of influence in economic, political, news media, and academic circles. The published reports of the task forces appointed by the commission have dealt with international economic and political issues such as oil and other energy resources, world trade, a world monetary system, international institutions and cooperation, East-West relations, control and exploitation of the oceans, and the difficulties currently besetting democratic governments. Although the commission had received a certain amount of publicity since its foundation, interest in its activities greatly increased when it was observed that President Carter and Vice President Mondale, as well as many high-ranking appointed officials in the Carter administration, had been members.

The present list cites all the commission's publications thus far issued and a selection of published writings about its activities and ideas. The arrangement is roughly chronological in each part. News stories and reviews commenting solely on the reports of the task forces are not included. An uncataloged set of the commission's publications is available for examination in the Bibliography Section of the General Reading Rooms Division.
